Generative AI in workplace - the 4th Industrial Revolution

Thanks to the recent leaps in AI technology, the times we are currently living in have been referred to as "the 4th Industrial Revolution". As with previous industrial revolutions, this transformative period is expected to bring about changes in the labour landscape. Inevitably, this has prompted increased attention (and perhaps apprehension) regarding the impact of job roles traditionally carried out by humans. These changes encompass shifts in skill requirements, the potential reduction of certain job roles, and opportunities for businesses to leverage new AI systems.

In this session, employment lawyers Catherine Leung and Jezamine Fewins will focus on the use of Generative AI in the workplace and explore the types of employment issues that have emerged as a result. They will also examine the implications of using Generative AI tools from a data privacy and intellectual property perspective. The session will cover both the benefits and challenges associated with employees using Generative AI tools and delve into the types of policies that companies should consider implementing to equip themselves for the future of work.

About the speakers

Catherine is the Head of Employment in the Lewis Silkin Hong Kong office.

Her clients come from a wide range of industry sectors including financial services, luxury retail and tech firms. A lot of her work has an international element to it, and she works closely with lawyers across Asia Pacific on regional employment law projects and helps clients navigate through complex cross-border issues.

She is experienced in providing practical and strategic advice on a full range of employment law issues including redundancies, bonus entitlement disputes, team moves, data privacy, and complex discrimination and sexual harassment cases. She also advises clients in relation to investigations brought by the Labour Department and the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Jezamine is the Head of Litigation in the Lewis Silkin Hong Kong office.

She has a dual practice of employment and IP which enables her to offer clients a unique perspective particularly in matters relating to the theft of confidential information and trade secrets. Jezamine regularly advises clients on team moves, misconduct investigations and the enforcement of restrictive covenants. Jezamine's clients are made up of multi-national companies, high net worth individuals, SMEs and not for profit organisations.

Jezamine regularly provides pro-bono services to charities, not-for-profit organisations and deserving causes and has for a number of years received awards from the Law Society's Pro Bono and Community Recognition Programme.
